Ultrastructural findings in some cases of ocular involvement with mycosis fungoides. The ultrastructural findings in 5 cases of ocular involvement with mycosis fungoides are described in the present paper. In one case, the ultrastructural findings were compatible with a lymphoid origin of the neoplasm. In 2 cases with clinical evidence of uveitis, the intravitreal infiltrate consisted of monomorphic lymphocytes. In one of these 2 cases, adenoma sebaceum could be detected in the skin. In 2 cases the diagnosis of ocular involvement with mycosis fungoides was not recognized before histologic examination of the conjunctiva, because the lesions were interpreted as a perivascular dendritic lichenoid reaction. The diagnosis of mycosis fungoides in these latter 2 cases was confirmed only after ultrastructural examination of the conjunctiva. It is concluded that ultrastructural examination is useful for establishing the diagnosis of conjunctival mycosis fungoides. The invention relates to a method for providing a head for a tape recording or playback machine, in which the support surface of the head is mechanically processed by an imprinting process, particularly a printing process. The process is used to create a printed code representing data concerning the machine, a machine operator or the like. The head includes a carrier section, in which several individual elements are mounted, and a contact surface, which cooperates with the medium. The elements are aligned in a direction of the carrier surface, and the carrier section is fixed in a position perpendicularly to the carrier surface.
